About Vancouver

Vancouver is the largest city in the Canadian province of British Columbia and is the third largest in Canada. As of 2006, Vancouver's population was 578,000 but its Census Metropolitan Area surpassed two million. Vancouver's residents (like those in many large Canadian cities) are ethnically diverse and over 50% are not native English speakers.

The City of Vancouver is located on the British Columbia's west coast, adjacent to the Strait of Georgia and across that waterway from Vancouver Island.

It is also north of the Fraser River and lies mostly in the western part of the Burrard Peninsula. The city of Vancouver is well-known as one of the world's most "livable cities" but it is also one of the most expensive in Canada and North America. Vancouver has also hosted many international events and most recently, it has gained worldwide attention because it and nearby Whistler hosted the 2010 Winter Olympic Games.

In the early days of its growth, Vancouver's economy was based around logging and sawmills which were established beginning in 1867. Although forestry is still Vancouver's largest industry today, the city is also home to the Port Metro Vancouver, which is the fourth largest port based on tonnage in North America.

Vancouver's second largest industry is tourism because it is a well-known urban center worldwide.

Vancouver is nicknamed Hollywood North because it is the third largest film production center in North America following Los Angeles and New York City. The Vancouver International Film Festival takes place annually each September. Music and visual arts are also common in the city.

Vancouver also has another nickname of "city of neighborhoods" as much of it is divided into different and ethnically diverse neighborhoods. English, Scottish, and Irish people were Vancouver's largest ethnic groups in the past, but today, there is a large Chinese-speaking community in the city. Little Italy, Greek town, Japan town, and the Punjabi Market are other ethnic
